Thou art adjudged to higher spheres to rise, With souls congenial join, --the good, the wise; With well-meaning men of every grade, Whose rule of life unbiassd conscience made. The judged heard with modest joy his fate, And felt recruited strength t enjoy his glorious state. The spark of life began once more to burn, And beautys lost proportions to return, --Improved return: from mornings chilly haze, Thus nature opens in the solar rays. Next there appeard before this awful throne, One whose chief boast was, to have nothing done. His creed of pride so wide from reason ran, As to despise all industry in man: The only things important, in his way, Were, skill to make a bet, and skill in play; And then to pass his time, not thus applied, He dressd, and drank, -- did anything beside; Tis not meant useful things; he neer was blamed For making thus his proudest friends ashamed: He proved that folly may be warpd by pride, To think that uselessness to greatness is allied. A judge demanded how on earth had run His threescore years, and what the good hed done. Somewhat abashd, he tremblingly replied, --My faults had all their source in family pride; For this, all occupations were denied; All were, I thought, injurious to my name, Save church, or law, or fighting, --roads to fame: These I disliked; with study quite at strife; Hating still more th obedient soldiers life. I eked my bounded means...
