Brand New Book  Print on Demand .Excerpt from The Canadian Builder The Sharpening of Woodworking Tools A Valuable Article for the Practical Workman from The National Builder The tools used to woodwork are ground and sharpened to more acute angles than those used for cutting harder substances, such as metal. The most suitable angle for any given tool is decided by the character of the material it has to cut. As there is a considerable difference in the hardness of different kinds of wood, the tools used for cutting it vary also in their cutting angles, tools used for soft wood being more acute than those for hard. This does not mean that tools must be kept specially for each kind of wood, or must be reground to suit each. A patternmaker working with soft pine or a joiner working chiefly with whitewood or cypress would sharpen their tools suitably for these woods and use them on hard woods occasionally, but if their work was chiefly with hard wood they would find the tool edge too acute. They would become dull very quickly, and if heavy cuts were taken would get broken and notched. A more obtuse angle would give a more durable cutting edge. necessary. The sharpening angle on a newly ground tool can be almost the same as the grinding angle; but as the edge wears back, as in Fig.2, the chisel has to be tilted more and more on the oilstone to avoid a wide sharpening facet. Grinding is a simple matter, requiring chiefly a knowledge of the most suitable angle to grind it. It is done either on a grindstone or emery wheel. In the latter case great care...
